WHERE IS PLASTIC MAN?

"WOOZY," said Plastic Man impressively, jabbing at his plump little friend with a forefinger that suddenly grew a yard long, "I'm depending on you to help capture the Hatchet Hobarty gang."

These words carried over the dictaphone concealed in the chandelier, through the wire connections to the anxious quartet of listeners in the alley behind. "Hatchet Hobarty gang!" repeated one. "Jeepers, Hatchie, dat means us!"

"Shaddup!" growled the leader of the group. "I want to hear more."

"They might spot me if I went walking along the street," continued Plastic Man to Woozy, "even if they didn't know I had their records." "Our records!" groaned a gangster. "Once our records get known, we'll be wearing stripes."

"Therefore," concluded Plastic Man, "I want you to carry the suitcase to the place I told you about. At once!"

"What suitcase?" asked Woozy. A silence. "Oh, I see what you mean. Leave it to me, Plas."

From the alley, the four members of the Hatchet Hobarty gang saw Woozy emerge on the street, carrying an immense red suitcase.

"See that bag?" whispered Hatchet to one of his men. "Quick, go to the nearest luggage place—get one as much like it as possible, slap a coat of red paint on it, and head back. We'll follow Woozy, stop him somewhere and switch bags on him. Hurry!"

Away sped the man on his errand, and the other three strolled after Woozy.

"Pardon me," said Hatchet, in a silky voice, "but aren't you the famous Woozy Winks?"

"None other," smirked Woozy. "Do we know each other? I have a bad memory for names, though it's true I always forget a face—"

"We know your record as a valiant crime fighter," went on Hatchet. "We also know your taste for double extra augmented ice cream sodas. By a strange coincidence, here's a drug store. If you will so honor us—"

"You bet your life I'll honor you!" cried Woozy, hurrying in to the soda counter. Hatchet bought him a soda. So did each of the other two. By the time Woozy had greedily guzzled the last of these, the fourth gangster had stolen in, carrying a suitcase that resembled the huge red valise that Woozy had set down beside him. Stealthily this fourth gangster sneaked Woozy's burden away, leaving his own.

"Thank you, gentlemen, thank you," said Woozy, picked up the substitute suitcase and waddled out. Hatchet Hobarty himself grabbed up the stolen bag and gestured his followers away.

"We'll take this to our hideout," he said. "Remember, Plastic Man said he had our records, and he was sending Woozy with this suitcase to a place he'd told Woozy about? It all adds up. Woozy was going to FBI headquarters, and this case is full of our records. It sure is heavy."

Swiftly they reached and entered their hidden headquarters and locked the doors. Then they gathered around the red suitcase.

"We'll burn every scrap of those records," exulted Hatchet, bending over it. "Hey, where's the catch on this thing?"

"The catch," rang out a clear voice they all knew too well, "is that you didn't bring a suitcase here at all. You brought me!"

The suitcase suddenly unfolded and stood up, a towering, accusing form. Plastic Man! With cries of terror, the crooks tried to flee. One snaky arm whipped around two of them, binding them like a rope. The other fist knocked Hatchet Hobarty silly. A foot tripped the fourth. And then Plastic Man unlocked the door, and there stood the FBI chief and Woozy.

"That clumsily planted dictaphone was the first thing I saw when Woozy and I entered our room," Plastic Man told Hatchet Hobarty. "I knew you were listening in, so I talked in a way to draw you into our trap."

"Aw, have a heart," begged Hatchet Hobarty. "You're elastic—can't you stretch a point and—"

"Silence!" said Plastic Man. "The only stretch that we'll discuss is the stretch you're all going to do in prison."
